COLLABORATION & SUPPORT: Student Behavior Management

When I talk about this issue, I like to remind people that approximately 85% of students ride the school bus with little to no behavior concerns. The remaining 15% require additional direction and intervention to meet established expectations.

Student behavior management begins with school bus drivers establishing clear expectations, consistently reinforcing those expectations, and holding students accountable. Interventions may include counseling, assigned seating, and parent communication. When these efforts are not effective, concerns are escalated to the building Principal.

Building Principals (and counselors) play a key role in addressing student behavior concerns. Alignment between the school building and school bus expectations is a priority, ensuring that similar behaviors receive consistent consequences across all settings, including classrooms, lunchrooms, and school buses. This consistency reinforces expectations and promotes positive student behavior.

Their support is essential in maintaining a safe and orderly environment on school buses. Ongoing collaboration between transportation and the building leadership allows for both individualized interventions and broader systemic improvements. The goal is to reduce repeat incidents and support positive student behavior trends.
